

Do You Need a Career Change?

When you get into a rut, you may blame it on your job. You don't like your boss, or your team is unmotivating. Your company is bureaucratic which means most decisions get placed on the backburner. They sit on it for months and opportunities have passed by the time they make decisions.

You think it's time to change companies. It may be that your current company is not right for you. However, did you ever consider that maybe it's the career that is no longer right for you?

When you first started your career, you had enthusiasm because you believed you would rocket to the top. Situations happened, and you are not much further along than when you started. Your work is routine, and there is no longer anything to look forward to, except a paycheck. Even that hasn't grown much over the years.

Get the spark back by starting something new. It could be related somehow to your current career, or you may choose something completely different. You don't have to leave your company right away to get started. You can use the internet to learn new skills and get a feel for what field you'd like to pursue. You can do this all while continuing to collect a paycheck from your current gig.

When you go through the process of looking for another career, you will find something wonderful happening to yourself. You will start looking forward to the day when you can give your notice, not only to your current company but your career. It's exhilarating when you feel this, and it resets your attitude about your job. Your current employment situation becomes temporary because you are taking steps to get out. Anything your company throws your way, you handle it with newfound vigor. You know a secret that your company doesn't know, i.e., you are getting ready to leave soon.

Another great aspect of using the internet is that you can start an online business while still working. That means you will learn something new, create a venture that has potential to earn a living wage, and satisfies your goal of leaving your current career sooner than later. It that isn't a reason to get stoked, one doesn't exist.

Be aware that success in your new career won't be a straight line. There will be challenges along the way, and it may take you longer than planned. The key is to keep going and don't let anything stop you.